I called up the office this morning to inquire about the de Lattre funeral arrangements. I found [redacted] the funeral itself [redacted] to be held on Wednesday but meanwhile the body [redacted] lying in state at his home, and [redacted] remain there until one o'clock this afternoon. Therefore, E. and I went immediately to Paris and called at his house. He was dressed in [redacted] military uniform, surrounded by a guard of honor standing at attention. It was [redacted] moving to see the crowds of people of all classes of society going and coming -- most of them in tears.

We arrived back at Versailles, and had lunch there for Louise de Vilmorin, John Utter, Leonora Corbett, and Baron van Zuylen, [redacted] a delegate from Holland to the United Nations.

This afternoon we returned to Paris, and I worked on my essays.
